KD XXXVIII-XL = DL X, 153-154

D.L. X, 153

KD XXXVIII Nothing now has happened to the general state of affairs; if what the law says is just, does not terrible fit in with the pronouncement? If what is just is for the same actions, then it is not just. And if what is just is not the same for all people, then it is not just for anyone. And if what is just is no longer useful, then it was just as long as it was useful to the mutual community of fellow citizens; and it was no longer just when it was no longer useful.

KD XXXIX He who has best guarded against thieves of the outside world is the one who brings over his kindred there by whom it is possible, and who does not make hostile to chase for whom it is impossible; he avoids all sociability who is not able to do this, and he who is able to do it, he is not willing.

KD XL Those who were able to build up for themselves an ever-sure confidence in their relatives were able to live the most pleasant existence with each other, having the strongest confidence and receiving in return the fullest fundamentals; they did not secrete, as if out of pity, the death of one who had finished living.
