also those Epicureans whose devotion to Caesar's memory was stronger. On 1st August Piso made the famous attack against Antony, which gave heart to Cicero (Phil. i, 10-14). The emphasis was evidently not so much on peace—before and later Piso's favourite subject (Appian, iii, 50; 54-61)—as on constitutional normality: 'excessurum se ex Italia dixit, deos penatis et sedes patrias relictum, si, quod di omen averterint, rem publicam oppressisset Antonius' (Phil. xii, 6, 14). Hirtius, although obviously not favourable to the Liberators (cf. ad Att. xv, 6, 2), was adverse to Antony (Fam. xi, 1; ad Att. xv, 8, 1) and capable melior fieri (ad Att. xiv, 20, 4). Pansa was more suspect, but still not a hopeless case (ad Att. xv, 22). After all, they both died for the Republic. Little is known about Trebatius Testa, but he was then on very friendly terms with Cicero (who wrote for him the Topica; cf. Fam. vii, 19) and justified to him what was thought to be the excessive loyalty of C. Matius to the memory of Caesar (Fam. xi, 27-8). Matius himself, of course, is no exception to our argument.

Piso's domestic philosopher, Philodemus, is a more complex case. He was a Hellenized Oriental and a professional teacher of Λάθε βιώσας. Taking into account these qualities, we shall recognize that he went very far. H. Diels was able to understand the following words in the Herculanean papyri of περὶ θεῶν, Book i, col. xxv, 22 ff. (Abh. Preuss. Ak. 1915, 7, p. 44):

ἀλλὰ γάρ ὑπέρ τῆς ἐκ θεῶν ταρσῆς ίκανῶς οἷμαι μοι λελέχθαι καὶ προτετράφθαι τὸν εὐφυέστατον, ὃστ' ἔξω μένειν αἰώνιων ταρσῶν ὡς ἀπαλλαγησόμενον κακῶν τῶν χαλεπῶν καὶ περιποιησόμενον τάγαθά τὰ συνέχοντα καὶ μόνον ἁυτόν δινδρά νομοιοῦντα, τῶν ἀλλων δὲ καταφρονήσοντα πάντων ὡς σέρφων, καὶ οὐ μόνον τῶν ταπεινοτέρων, ἀλλὰ καὶ τῶν αὐτοῖς μεγιστα χρήματα κεκτημένων ιδιωτῶν καὶ τῶν ἐπιφανεστάτων ἐν δυνάμει πολιτικαῖς καὶ τῶν τὴν ὑπουρλότην ἐκκαιόντων δταν δρά παρωσαμένους ὑφ' ἐνός 'Αντωνίου χειρας τὰ κατ' ἐστι τούς ἐναντίους.

To Diels the passage meant Republican sentiments, which Philodemus would have expressed after the constitution of the Second Triumvirate (Abh. Preuss. Ak., 1916, n. 6, p. 34, 1). R. Philippson (Hermes liii, 1918, 381) understood a profession of impartiality to be dated in the summer of 44: 'An seine glühende Freiheitsliebe glaube ich nicht. Auch Epikur ist Opportunist gewesen.' This is an opinion which we can follow only with some modification. The words were written before the Triumvirate was constituted: τούς ἐναντίους are the Liberators. Philodemus concludes from the failure of opposing Antony that his philosophy is right in suggesting aloofness from the crowd. The most convenient date seems to be immediately before or after the speech of Piso, which left its author isolated: 'Pisoni qui in eum (Antonium) primus invectus est nullo adsentiente' (Fam. xii, 2, 1). So far we can agree with Philippson. But if the logical argument of Philodemus is a defence of Λάθε βιώσας, the animus is not indifferent to the events. The words reflect the indignation of a man who saw the defenders of the Republic playing into the hands of the tyrant. He is against Antony, but has no faith in the Liberators. In a book περὶ θεῶν the same Philodemus invited men to face death from political persecutors with courage: ἔγώ δὲ θαυμάζω τῶν ἔβιωτον ἡγουμένων τὸ καταγνωσθῆναι καὶ ταῦτ' οὐχ ὑπὸ σπουδαίων, ἀλλ' ὑπὸ χειρίστων ἀνθρώπων, μᾶλλον δὲ θηρίων κτλ. (xxxv, col. 6, 11 ff.). The last editor, T. Kuiper, Philodemus over den Dood, 1925, 96, proposed for the book the date 43 B.C., which must be approximately right, although Kuiper's argument is founded upon an obvious slip. The subject and the tendency of the book seem closely related to the De morte by Varius Rufus. Without emphasising details, it is clear that in Philodemus the tradition of the school and the call against the tyrant were in conflict.

On the whole, the events of 44 B.C. prove that Cassius was not an exceptional case among the contemporary Epicureans. The majority stood for the Republic against Caesarism.
