J. Krauey. Perverted sexual instincts

the sexual instinct, with retained consciousness of the morbid nature of the condition," and he named it "contrary sexual instinct" (conträre Sexualempfindung), a symptom of a neuropathic (psychopathic) constitution.

This paper of Westphal's was followed in the course of the next few years by a number of others. Schminke¹ and Scholz² each published a case; and Goek³ and Servaes⁴ two cases each, but of Goek's cases only one is quite satisfactory. Westphal⁵ reported a third case; Legrand de Saulle⁶ a case; and Stark⁷ four cases, to one of which, however, some uncertainty attaches. Krafft-Ebing⁸ also published a case, and gave a résumé of the cases previously recorded, along with a systematic account of the various abnormal developments of the sexual instinct. At a later period there followed a case by Tomassia Ariggio,⁹ and another somewhat doubtful case by Kelp.¹⁰

Without counting the cases published before Westphal's first paper, although they might very properly be included, and omitting those among recent cases that are not altogether satisfactory, there are now on record thirteen well-established cases of this affection; and to these the case that I am to relate will add a fourteenth. It is true I have seen the patient three times only, but from the information he has given me about himself I have little doubt as to the case. Moreover, and to this I attach particular importance, his narrative gave me the impression of being a truthful story—a
