read did to me entirely be a lacuna, & in which I had no claims but most very affectionate ones.
But I was the more enough to know that you suffer without wanting to know why, and that you have always in your little wishes & prayers that you can't part in relation with me & my husband - but a word is this for you.

As to your views of English affairs, I am far more inclined to trust to the justice that to that of any Englishman. England has to have been divided into hostile camps - in matters of opinion - that we are all unconsciously imbued with opinions & prejudices which bias all our judgment.
My husband expects to find in your book the confirmation of his own opinions. He was expressing to me the same views that I have expressed so well should you think the expression possible - if you had known of this circumstance you would some, I am sure.

You write to me when I am in the middle of my illness that I shall be from within & that the way of literature
is not just now circumstances but however it must for that. It is the form or the manner
appeared in the title & this was never you make a little
a trifling transference offer to you, and it was not
My waiting here that I left on some it has remained in

I enabled me to say some few things I wished to say.
My health is about as good as I hope to have it. By dint of great caution & great-privation I have kept from dangerous attacks. I give up one half of life to ~~keep~~ the other - a poor calculation, if that other were not valuable to one for whom it is my duty & wish to live.
But I think I may perhaps one day be able to reach that point. That is a star in the distance. But I am by no means satisfied. My husband is tolerably well. Mary has had an attack of Bronchitis which terrified me but passed off favorably.
The children are quite well.
My small world is peaceful & quiet.
Except - I will name Sir & Miss Behine me always, with the true affection, respect & sympathy.
Yours Sarah Austin.
