Ne raconter que les faits Foucault, Michel

Then one Sunday I had sensations all day long. After dinner I sat down on nearly dead, so I went to my room, took a clean sheet of white paper, and fringed myself over it. My pen only slightly quivered. I fringed again, and then as the paper lay before me covered with sperm-pools I cried because it was not up to dear Sarah's engine, laid up head on the table where the paper lay, and scribbled with despair, jealousy, and repente, for I thought some one would find her if I did not, that it would be her hateful husband whom she had helped to keep with my money.

I saw my own face on several occasions of my life I have fringed myself over a clean sheet of foolscap paper; it was mostly done for curiosity, to see what my name was like, whether it was as thin, or as thick, or as large in quantity as at the last time I previously had masturbated.

The interesting shift, I think, is from the more acute bringing together of masturbation, writing, desecration, delusion of the husband and cover the engine in a machine who has great quantities of money, as well as sperm, to spend on me) in the first paragraph to the more dramatized, British-empirical "curiosity" in the second.
